BOAT MISSING ON GREEN RIVER.

Apprehension Felt by Friends of Those Known to be Aboard.

IS NOW FIVE DAYS OVERDUE.

Feared the Boat May Have Gone
Down Causing the Loss of Seven Lives.

(Special to the "News.")

Moab, Utah, May 18.—Some apprehension is felt for the safety of the steamer, "City of Moab," which was due to arrive here from Green River five days ago. Aboard the steamer are Charles Anderson, W. I. Downey, C. Van Hooserbeke, J. J. Lundeen, W. B. Elia and two members of the crew, whose names are not known. In order to ascertain, if possible, something concerning the missing boat, Orson Adams, Jr., is in Thompson using every endeavor to get news by telephone from Moab. As nothing is known here, however, a relief party is being formed consisting of J. N. Corbin, H. Montgomery and Frank Hall, who will sail down the river in order to clear up the mystery and render assistance if it is needed.

Parties acquainted with the Green River-Moab steamboat and the line over which it runs, are of the opinion that something happened to the machinery going down the river, while in the great box canyon, and the boat becoming helpless, struck a rock and stove a hole in its hull. The ratchet with which the starting bar is used was broken, and before leaving Blake City, a temporary makeshift was fixed up at a local blacksmith shop. It is feared that this gave out, and when a boat is drifting with current or tide the rudder is of no account. A boat or the men were carried down there it would be all day with them. The man whose name was not ascertained by the morning papers, was H. V. Yokoy, a surveyor who has done work in that country for the government. The boat was a fine affair, costing $5,000, with two 40-horsepower gasoline engines costing $4,500. The boat was propelled by twin screws of 14 inch blades, and was used for tourists.
